This thesis explores the activism surrounding the establishment of women’s studies in Sweden from 1975–1995, through an analysis of the organization the Forum for Women Scholars and Women's Studies. The main purpose of the thesis is to analyze how the Forum balanced their two objectives of promoting gender equality in academia and establishing and supporting women's studies and women's perspectives.

By examining the Forum’s archive material, this thesis analyzes the organization’s struggle for academic gender equality and women's studies, highlighting the dilemmas, consequences and paradoxes inherent in this dual mission by asking: Could the Forum separate the arguments for women’s studies on the one hand, and gender equality on the other? What kind of impact did the Forum’s activism have, from a so called state feminist perspective? What were the consequences of having multiple agendas and areas of conflict in the intersection between academic research and politics?

Historically, marginalized groups have had to combine different strategies in the struggle for, as Nancy Fraser would put it, redistribution and recognition. For women, the demand for recognition required that women define the differences between women and men. For this purpose, Gayatri Spivak’s notion of strategic essentialism is used to highlight the strategic reasoning behind the Forum’s demands for the recognition of gendered perspectives and experiences.

As other scholars have noted, the government reinforced stereotypical notions of female scholars and was also unable to separate women's studies from gender equality work. However, with its emphasis on specific aspects of state feminism, i.e. the interaction between feminist activists and the government, this thesis shows that the Forum played an important role in the reproduction of “the female scholar” as well as ideas about gendered perspectives and their value within an academic environment dominated by men. The Forum reproduced, sometimes for strategic reasons, notions of gender difference, in order to navigate ostensibly meritocratic ideas about academic quality. In many ways, this strategic approach was a result of the feminist ambition that undergirded the Forum’s very existence: the goal of combating gendered power structures and inequalities. Feminism’s normative objectives required an instrumental approach with its focus on a future that should, and could be, more equal.
